

Covering Climate: What is the Media Missing?

March 24, 2021

Panelists:

Dr. Genevieve Guenther is the founder and director of End Climate Silence, a volunteer organization dedicated to helping the media cover the climate crisis with the urgency it deserves. Dr. Guenther is a member of the affiliate faculty at The New School, where she sits on the advisory board of the Tishman Environment and Design Center.

Dharna Noor is a staff writer at Gizmodo's climate vertical, Earther. She frequently writes about climate and energy justice. Her work has also been published in Truthout, the Real News Network, and Jacobin, and will appear in a forthcoming anthology of climate essays from the New Press.

Rachel Ramirez is an independent journalist born and raised in the Northern Mariana Islands, currently living in New York City. She covers race, climate, environmental justice, and militarization of the Pacific Islands. You can find her work at Vox, The Guardian, HuffPost, Grist, and more.

Andrew Revkin has written about climate change for more than 30 years, mostly for The New York Times. He has held top positions at National Geographic and Discover Magazine, won top awards in science journalism as well as a Guggenheim fellowship, and has authored books about climate change. He now directs the Initiative on Communication Innovation and Impact at Columbia University's Earth Institute.

Moderator:

Jessica McKenzie is a freelance journalist who covers agriculture, conservation, energy, the environment, and hiking/backpacking. Her work has been published in The New York Times, National Geographic, Backpacker, and Audubon Magazine, among others. She also writes a nature and outdoor adventure newsletter called Pinch of Dirt.